

Copyright Guidelines

Presenters must obtain permission to use copyright protected items.

What is copyrighted?

Virtually every website has a copyright. For items obtained from the internet, it is your responsibility to verify that it does not have a copyright prior to using it, or to request permission from the copyright holder. Copyrighted items may include:

Visuals: Images, illustrations, photographs, cartoons, company logos, etc.

Videos: Movies, television clips, music videos, YouTube videos, etc. Do not publicly show videos without permission—it is best to link directly to the website on which the video is housed rather than embedding in the presentation.

Text: Articles, websites, etc.

Audio: Recordings, music, etc.

Citing sources vs. requesting permission

Citing a source is NOT a substitute for requesting permission. If an item is copyrighted, you must request permission to use it.

Use of presenter's own published work in subsequent publications and presentations

- Publishers require a transfer copyright as a condition of publication. You must request permission from the publisher to use your work in subsequent publications or presentations.
- The author agreement completed for the publisher will describe any retained author rights. If none are mentioned, no rights are retained.

Educational use

- Presenters CANNOT use online images or text of others, even for educational purposes, without obtaining copyright permission.

Public domain

Presenters can use works in the public domain without obtaining permission. In this case, the source should be cited. The public domain consists of:

- Government publications
- Works published before 1923
- Items placed in the public domain by their creator

Note: If anything on the public domain has a credit line to another person, entity, or previous publication, public domain does not apply and you must obtain permission. The internet as a whole is NOT public domain.

For more information on copyright, visit the United States Copyright Office website at copyright.gov/help/faq.